

This compendium is a survey of state law on various issues associated with surveillance. It examines the applicability of the work product doctrine of the attorney-client privilege to video surveillance, whether such surveillance must be disclosed and, if so, the scope and timing of disclosure. We believe the compendium will be a useful resource for any client involved in the defense of personal injury claims. We welcome any questions or comments related to this material specifically and this topic generally. Click each state below for that state’s chapter.
